“You come to Malapascua to see the thresher sharks, but you leave remembering Gato,” the anecdote goes.

No argument here. Gato Island is one of the more famous dive sites near Malapascua. A marine reserve and sea snake sanctuary, it is a showcase of undersea life: banded sea snakes, cattle fish, sea horses, nudibranchs, frog fishes, scorpion fishes, porcupine fishes, smashing mantis shrimps, squid, big-mouthed mackerel, white tip sharks, bamboo sharks, cat sharks. The corals are in good condition, and the rocky island has interesting underwater rock formations, overhangs, and swim-through.

Also expect to see various types of cuttlefish, octopus (including blue-ringed octopus), moray eels, frog fish, to mention just a few. The night dive is spectacular, with mandarin fish mating all over the place, seahorses, bobtail squid, seahorses, and huge crabs and sea stars. Mimic and blue ring octopus can be seen as well as the occasional stargazer and hairy frogfish. Some have said the muck diving rivals Lembeh Straits.
